Description: Reno police struggle to curb illegal street racing

The summer months bring an uptick in illegal street racing reports, according to Reno Police.

Street racers are looking for long and straight roads, few traffic lights and places with a small police presence. They appear to have found that in Stead.

"You'll be watching your TV and you just hear them going by [at] 100 miles an hour, just screaming down the road," said Don Cordier, a resident of Stead.

Neighbors say they see and hear street racers, in both cars and on street bikes, turn Stead Boulevard into a racetrack.

"They'll zip up and down between the two areas here, between the curves of the street and easily they're hitting 60 or 70 miles an hour," said Ernest Burdick, who lives on Stead Blvd.

Stead is in the jurisdiction of the Reno Police Department.

"It's really a luck of the draw for officers to catch street racers operating in north, south or west Reno," said Officer Tim Broadway with the Reno Police Department.

Broadway says this isn't a new problem; it emerges every summer in all areas of Reno. But there is a reason street racers can be drawn to Stead.

"Typically the Reno Police Department has one officer assigned for that entire area," said Broadway.

People in the community say they have called the police multiple times to report the street racers. But ultimately, they say they're told the more urgent calls take precedence.

"I called the police at about midnight the other night and they told me the call was too low priority for anyone to come out." said Cordier.

Broadway says the Reno Police Department is trying to add more officers to the force. He said the number of officers has dropped in recent years.

So for now, Stead is patrolled by a single officer.

"Anytime you have one police officer in an area, it's hard to respond to all the citizen's needs in a timely manner," said Broadway.

Meanwhile, residents of Stead are hoping additional officer will soon be patrolling their neighborhoods and Stead Boulevard to help solve the racing problem.

In the meantime, they're pleading with the racers.

"Slow down. Your life is more important than racing up and down the street," said Cordier.
